Lent 2018 – “Are We Fools for Believing in the Resurrection?”

For the message about the cross is foolishness to those who are perishing, but to us who are being saved it is the power of God. 1 Corinthians 1:18

Growing up, I had a friend whose father died on April Fools. Every year, as the anniversary of his death rolled around, people would not believe her. As if what she was saying was just another April Fool’s day joke – a despairing one at that, often met with dismissive sneers.

I share this story because it reminds me of the kind of despair the disciples must have experienced after the loss of their teacher. The public execution must have been horrifying, especially as people—who just a week before had cheered him—sneered and called out, “Crucify Him!”

Up until this point, the disciples had been called fools for following this itinerant preacher from Nazareth. Even on the cross, they made a fool of him by labeling him “King of the Jews,” a title he would have never taken upon himself. Jesus’ only response, “If you say so.”

So for those of us who identify with the Christian faith, we come through the Lenten season in anticipation of this horrific event, the crucifixion of our teacher, savior, and liberator. If that were not enough, those closest to him, the women can be seen clamoring at the tomb in search of his body which had mysteriously disappeared. Almost as if in their great grief, they had forgotten his own teaching, “The Son of Man is to be betrayed into human hands, and they will kill him, and three days after being killed, he will rise again” (Mark 9:31).

Rise again? One would have to be a fool to think that the dead can come back to life. My friend’s dad surely never did. So what is it about these sacred stories and our faith in a savior that rises from the dead? Are we fools for believing in the resurrection?

My first thought is yes. But no more foolish than the disciples that followed Jesus until then end and then went on to continue to build the Kin-dom of Heaven here on Earth. No more foolish than those that hold fast to hope and have the courage to live into liberation.

The world is built in such a way that we are supposed to feel foolish for believing in these things. People die every day. Families are torn apart. Addiction is real. Fake news has become common place. However, the Good News of the Gospel presents us with a counter narrative. One in which, foolishness just may lead to faithfulness.

Faith in the seen and unseen. Faith in the miraculous. Faith in the One who came to save us from our foolish ways. Faith in the other world that is indeed possible.

Praise be to God!

Reflection on Psalm 118:1-2, 19-29 & Mark 11:1-11

Jesus was a disrupter. In the same ways that Uber or Airbnb have disrupted their respective industries, Jesus disrupted the faith communities of first century Palestine. Whether it was healing on the Sabbath, flipping tables in the Temple, or talking to Samaritan women, Jesus was always disrupting the accepted ideas of God's love.

But it is his triumphant entrance into Jerusalem that may be the most politically disruptive act of his ministry. He sends his disciples to get the donkey he's pre-arranged. He's planned it out to come in from the east riding that donkey, a symbol of humility, at the same time (according to Crossan and Borg in The Last Week), that Pilate comes in from the west, in full militaristic splendor, making it clear to the gathered Passover crowds that Rome was in charge here. It's political, it's theater, and it's effective. Those gathered to cheer on Jesus are thumbing their noses at Pilate and the powerful.

Back in January, estimates claimed that about 1 out of every 100 Americans participated in a Women's March. This year's marches were even bigger than 2017's, which had been described as the biggest in this nation's history. The Women's Marches disrupt the idea that women are willing to accept the status quo of being less than, second class, and without voice.

As we march into Holy Week this year, where every day brings more distressing news of the loss of jobs, or civil rights, or immigrant rights, or safety net programs, it's important to keep in mind that there is a long, painful, hard road in the week between Palm Sunday and the Resurrection. There will be the death of the old ways to be born to the new. While it is often times difficult and always scary, we remember that Resurrection is the most powerful disrupter of all. May this Palm Sunday be a reminder of the disruptive work still to be done. Rev. Robyn Gray, PhD, is the bridge interim pastor at St John's United Church of Christ in Grand Rapids, Michigan?

Reflection on Psalm 51:1-12

Reflection, Self-Criticism, and the Fight for Justice

Have mercy on me, O God, according to your steadfast love; according to your abundant mercy blot out my transgressions.

Wash me thoroughly from my iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin. For I know my transgressions, and my sin is ever before me.

Against you, you alone, have I sinned, and done what is evil in your sight, so that you are justified in your sentence and blameless when you pass judgment.

Indeed, I was born guilty, a sinner when my mother conceived me.

You desire truth in the inward being; therefore, teach me wisdom in my secret heart. Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow. Let me hear joy and gladness; let the bones that you have crushed rejoice.

Hide your face from my sins, and blot out all my iniquities.

Create in me a clean heart, O God, and put a new and right spirit within me.

Do not cast me away from your presence, and do not take your holy spirit from me. Restore to me the joy of your salvation, and sustain in me a willing spirit.

Psalm 51 holds a special place in my life. It was used in a morning prayer service I put together and ran in my undergraduate years. I find the words “purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean” still stick out to me all these years later. As I read the words of this psalm, I cannot help but think of the need for self-reflection.

Throughout the season of Lent, we are encouraged to reflect- on our lives, on our sins, on our relationship to the divine. I find that I enjoy this added focus on reflection, as it encourages me to take a step back and take a look at myself. In our society, that encourages quickly moving on to the next thing, it is vital to stop for a minute and seek to better understand ourselves.

As may be expected of a student of Chicago Theological Seminary, my theology is grounded in fighting for a more just world. Theology must be lived out in practice. So I find that this opportunity for reflection is a time to think not only about my inner self, but also about my broader connections in society.

Taking the time to reflect and understand the complex web of connections we inhabit is key to the fight for justice. We need to understand the ways that we are involved in power systems- systems built on racism, sexism, ableism, colonialism, imperialism, and capitalism. We need to understand these systems, and our connections to them, so that we can begin to dismantle them. We must take the purging hyssop, and apply it to the ills of our society.

Fred Hampton once asked, “Why don’t you live for the people? Why don’t you struggle for the people?” As we live and struggle for justice for the people, we need to learn to practice self- criticism. We must be able to acknowledge the ways that we harm others, and then turn and struggle for a better world. We must be able to see the ways the we benefit from oppressive systems, and seek to remove ourselves from them. We must be able to acknowledge when we are wrong. We must be able to stop centering ourselves, and be able to take feedback from others.

Reflection and self-criticism are crucial tools in helping us along the long road of the fight for justice. Purge us with hyssop lord, so that we can better fight for the people.

Reflection

I made my first church presentation when I was fourteen. In a Sunday evening worship service, I had to explicate the first verse of the hymn “Beneath the Cross of Jesus.” “Beneath the cross of Jesus, I fain would take my stand.”

Even though I was a hymn nerd, I didn’t know how to begin. The obvious being a good starting point I looked up “fain” in the dictionary. Its flowery mid-19th century hymn language was not my language.

To my surprise, it meant “with pleasure, gladly.” My guess had been “with reluctance, hardly gladly.” The hymns I knew kept the cross at a safe distance. “On a hill, faraway stood an old rugged cross.”

“There is a green hill far away without a city wall.” I wasn’t prepared for a personal encounter with “the old, rugged cross.”

But, even at a distance, I experienced the cross as judgment. How could I live up to crucifixion? My teen-aged self, full of doubts and confusion, was glad I didn’t get verse three: “My sinful self my only shame, my glory all the cross.”

When I was a child, I spoke and thought like a child. When I became an adult, well, the world was not what I could have imagined (in dream or nightmare) fifty years ago.

Our communication devices may have changed but Black Lives Matter, mass incarceration, the continued murder of transgender persons, our nation’s obsession with guns, deportation and hatred of the immigrant, #metoo, backpedaling on previously-won rights - all of these plus the election of 45 transforming barely beneath the surface hatreds and fears into violence mean Jesus’ words in John,

“Now is the judgment of this world; now the ruler of this world be will be driven out” are the gospel good news we need.

The crucifixion judges the corrupt systems we have created. Are we complicit in the systems which thrive? Are we resisting systems that condemn the innocent, deny basic human rights to those who need them, split families apart or kill people who dare to be who they are?

Week 5

The overly personalized 1868 language of “Beneath the Cross of Jesus” has been replaced by the 1929 hymn “Before the Cross of Jesus” with words by Congregational pastor Ferdinand Blanchard. “Before your cross, O Jesus, our lives are judged today; the meaning of our eager strife is tested by your way.”

The cross is not on a hill faraway. It is here and now judging our sin-filled systems and inspiring us to find new life-giving ways in these days of hatred, ignorance, fear, and violence.

Reflection on Psalm 107:1-3, 17-22

Psalm 107 begins with an impassioned reminder to give thanks to the Lord, because God is good.

We are reminded that just like the wind visits the 4 corners of the earth and we know not from whence it comes nor where it goes, God visited the east and the west and the north and the south redeeming those in need. Let those who have been redeemed from the four quarters of the earth say so, and tell their story of redemption.

Even though some were sick as a result of the way they lived their life, and because of this had endured affliction. These afflicted souls loathed food and drew near to the threshold of death, yet even these called out to the lord in their distress. At the very words of their beseeching, God saved them from their anguish and destruction, healed and delivered.

Prayer: Gracious God of Many Names – you heal us from our afflictions, and deliver us from our troubles. May we never forget the troubles from which you saved us, and may our prayers of praise and gratitude never cease. Give us the strength to walk the soft earth healed and transformed, following the path you lay before us with gratitude in our hearts, and songs of joy rising from our renewed spirits.

In all of your beautiful names, Amen, Amin, Ashe, Aho!

Reflection

It is no accident that the Gospel of John places Jesus' Temple cleansing at the beginning of his ministry. For John's readers, this is the first public act of Jesus. Here comes Jesus, fresh off of his first miracle, wielding a whip of cords—quite an introduction! Yet, Jesus' anger displayed in this physical altercation seems to be justified, even warranted. I'm reminded of the words of Gloria Steinem: "The truth will set you free. But first it will piss you off."

Jesus was Jewish and was fighting to save the soul of his tradition. In his view, the Temple was a sacred place where divinity and humankind coalesce. During Passover, the festival week-long festival to celebrate liberation from oppression (i.e., divine salvation, past and future), he finds the Temple littered with opportunists that were exploiting the people by turning the Temple into a marketplace. Such a scene displayed the corruption of his religious values, exacerbated by the exploitation of the people.

What happens when our sacred places are profaned? In the era where evangelical Christianity has seemingly been co-opted by religious opportunists and nationalists through an ungodly alliance with the Trump administration, churches have become marketplaces. Pastors have propagated empire's agenda.

As people of faith, people that seek to honor the liberative and salvific nature of our faiths, where is our anger? Will we use our anger towards cleansing our places of worship? For those of us that claim to follow in the way of Jesus, we must take this story—and its contemporary implications— seriously.

In this Lenten season, what do we need to let go of? As we prepare for the journey of death and resurrection, may we not be afraid to let harmful religion die. Sometimes this means laying down our own security and picking up the tools of liberation.

Reflection on Genesis 17: 1-7, 15-17

“Sticks and stones will break my bones, but names can never hurt me.” If there was ever an untrue childhood adage, this is it. Names matter. A lot. They identify us, and maybe even reflect who we are. Think of how you feel when someone mispronounces or misspells your name. It seems like a lack of respect—of not caring enough to get it right.

Parents-to-be pore over name books or family trees, searching for just the right one for their new child. I remember that neither of my boys had names until they were several days old. We thought they were going to be girls, so we had not bothered to choose any boys’ names. The hospital staff was annoyed at the delay in their paperwork. But I needed to hold those tiny boys and study their little faces for a while before I knew what they should be called. As they grew older, though we resisted, their given names were shortened by their friends. Daniel became “Dan,” Richard became “Rich.” And now, those seem right. As for me, no shortened first name ever stuck, but I do cringe whenever someone calls me “Hopwell!”

I wonder what Abram and Sarai thought when God chose to change their names. This was truly a change of identity—from Abram, “exalted father” to Abraham, “father of a multitude.” From Abram’s “princess” Sarai to Sarah, “princess of the nations.” It was also a sign of a call to a new life. Not bad for two old geezers who had been unable to conceive. No wonder Abram fell on his face and laughed! And yet, it was his faith in God and in God’s faithfulness that earned him the new name and allowed him to live into it.

What about you? Did your parents’ name for you have a dream attached? Have you lived into it or have you gone in a different direction? Has God called you into new life? Are you living into that?

Reflection on Mark 8: 31-38

In reflecting on Mark 8: 31-38, the question that struck my heart and mind was verse 37, “For what can a man give in return for his soul?” In a recent sermon, I reminded our congregation that those we look up to in history were not monoliths to themselves, but rather people trying to do the best they could. The same was true of the people reflected in the pages of the bible, and of us today. We are none of us perfect. Who does not know the bitter taste of shame at failing to stand for your beliefs, even for a moment, like Peter? And yet, this verse reminds us that silence is more costly than any consequences that may come when we live out our values.

We are all, right now, favored or cursed to live in “interesting times.” Many of us face some of the same challenges as those in the first century of the common era. And yet, when I look around me at CTS, I see people who are refusing to pay the price of a soul. People who are leading resistance, speaking truth to power, using privilege to amplify the voices and stories of those who are unheard or unseen. In this season of reflecting on death and rising, let us continue to refuse the price of a soul by rejecting the death of oppression and heralding the rising of equality. I will leave you with the words of one of the 5th century Desert Elders, reminding us that one “who keeps death before [their] eyes will at all times overcome [their] cowardliness.” Amen and blessed be

Lent 2018 – Week 1 Reflection on Mark 1:9-15

The Ups and Downs of a Spiritual Journey

Jesus' baptism at the beginning of his ministry sounds like a real "high." It had to be a profound experience to see the heavens parting and the Spirit descending as a dove, or to hear an audible affirmation of God's blessing that God was pleased, and to be called "Beloved." (Mark 1:9-15) How wonderful it is to feel confident our path is the right one. Oops! Immediately following this "high," he is thrust into a "low" - a wilderness with wild beasts and the satanic power that instills doubts and tries to make us question our values. "Are you sure this is what God wants? What are you getting out of this?"

Isn't that just the way it is? Just when we feel confident, life takes us someplace we don't want to go, to hear things that we don't want to hear. Yuck! Metaphorically, we all prefer to live on the mountain tops with bright sunshine and beautiful vistas communing with the presence of God and, preferably, far removed from the nitty gritty daily grind in the valley below - for valleys can easily turn into a wilderness.

Some suggest that having doubts shows a lack of faith. It does not. Doubts, temptations, and trials are simply part of the natural ebb and flow of moving through life's journey. Sometimes we are confident and, at other times, we find ourselves in the wilderness, by our own choices or by the twists and turns of life itself.

Lenten season is akin to walking through the wilderness - a time to consider our tests and temptations to yield to the cultural despair or personal despondency or, to check in if in resisting powers and principalities, we are being sucked into the ever-present temptation of the vortex of cynicism. Some days we find ourselves on the mountain tops yet other days we are smack dab in the wilderness. But, Mark says even in the wilderness Jesus communed with angels. In our times of testing and doubting we can trust in the resurrection promise that Love cannot be defeated.

Whether on a mountain top, in a valley or wilderness, what matters is to keep plodding through our circumstances trusting in the Power of Love: "I am never forgotten or abandoned." "God's grace is sufficient." "Love never fails." Think on these things.

Focus Scripture: Mark 1:9-15

“At that time, Jesus came from Nazareth in Galilee and was baptized by John in the Jordan. Just as Jesus was coming up out of the water, he saw heaven being torn open and the Spirit descending on him like a dove. And a voice came from heaven: “You are my Son, whom I love; with you I am well pleased.” – NIV Mark 1:9-11

One of the most valuable lessons I have learned in my life comes from the recesses of my teenage years. In the midst of some teenage angst and rebellion, I quite vividly remember my mother saying to me:

“I will always love you, but I might not always like you.”

Over the years that saying has played constantly in the recesses of my memory. It is often a comforting reminder of the enduring and lasting quality of love.

“I will always love you, but I might not always like you.”

As we move into the season of Lent, I am reminded of another journey between parent and child that we will watch unfold in the days ahead. The journey is fraught with missteps and parallels that we can see coming, and yet are powerless to change.

Despite this knowledge, we return year after year to walk these steps together. In the darkness, we wait for the light that we surely know is coming.

“I will always love you, but I might not always like you.”

As we begin our walk towards the cross together this year, I urge you to remember that you are never far from the love which you seek. We all make missteps from time to time: say things we wish we could take back, do things we wish we hadn't done, or don't things that we wish we had.

Despite the missteps ahead and the crosses to bear, go forward into this season of waiting knowing that you are not alone. As a parent never really leaves a child, so too are you not alone in this wilderness.

Reflection on Psalm 25:1-10

There are times when scripture just seems so far away, so distant from who I am, or where I live. And then there's Psalm 25. This prayer leaps across the centuries into my heart—pulling on my needs and hopes for God to lead me, as I wait, all day long. (I'm not good at waiting.) The psalmist confesses a need for mercy and love, a hope that God will forgive and forget past sins, prayers which all of us can understand, I think.

But the psalmist also speaks to some real frustration with other people, asking God to “not let my enemies exult over me.” The psalm talks about those who are “wantonly treacherous”, and hopes they too will come to sufficient self-awareness as to be “ashamed”.

The Christian call to love is strong—love our enemies, love our neighbors as ourselves, love one another. Especially as a pastor, I'm supposed to love everyone and always see the image of God in them, right? Beautiful as that rhetoric may be, the reality is so...much...harder. Enemies do exult over us, whether it's in church politics, sports rivalries, all the way up through vicious abusers and oppressors. That exultation is real, and it hurts. And there are people who are wantonly treacherous, putting their own selfish desires ahead of their responsibilities to others, sometimes causing incredible harm.

So, what are we to do? Sometimes the only thing we can do—pray for them, like the psalmist. We can pray for God to stop their exultation, to let them be ashamed, not as schadenfreude, but so that they too might someday truly know the awesome, humbling power of God's steadfast love.
